Environmental education plays an important role in both fostering stewardship of our natural resources, such as the James River, and in improving the health and therefore the quality of life of our children. Recent research shows a critical link between children's exposure to the out-of-doors and some of the most pressing health issues facing families and society today: attention deficit (hyperactivity) disorder, obesity, stress management, learning and depression.

According to Richard Louv, author of the landmark book The Last Child in the Woods: Saving our Children from Nature Deficit Disorder, "direct exposure to nature is healthy for childhood development—physical, emotional and spiritual. Even creativity is stimulated by childhood experiences in nature."
